red and blue and green and cheap and skimmy that mark the women of the poorer men.

Econowives, they are called. These women are not divided into functions. They have to do everything; if they can. Sometimes there is a women all in black, a widow. There used to be more of them, but they seem to be diminishing. You don't see the commander's wives on the sidewalks. Only in cars.

The sidewalks here are cement. Like a child, I avoid stepping on the cracks. I'm remembering my feet on these sidewalks, in the time before, and what I used to wear on them. Sometimes it was shoes for running, with the cushioned soles and breathing holes, and stars of fluorescent fabric that reflected light in the darkness. Though I never ran at night; and in the daytime, only besides well-frequented roads.

Women were not protected then.

I remember the rules, rules that were never spelled out but that every woman knew.

Don't open your door to a stranger, even if he says he is the police. Make him slide his ID under the door. Don't stop on the road to help a motorist pretending to be in trouble.
